The gestation period is approximately 63 days, with an additional six weeks of nursing the puppies. Theoretically, a dog can give birth three times per year over its lifetime, but this puts tremendous strain on its body. Professional breeders generally breed their dogs twice in the animal's lifetime between the ages of 6 and 8 years.

Wild dogs do not have permanent dens like other animals. While some animals create dens to live in year-round, wild female dogs tend to only create dens for sheltering puppies after giving birth. Once the puppies are around 12 weeks old, the den is no longer needed. Wildlife and starvation are the biggest threats to wild dogs.
