Seniors can be particularly vulnerable online for several reasons. They are generally—though not always—more trusting. Unless they've been “connected” online for years, they are less likely to be familiar with all of the online scams out there. And seniors may not be as up-to-date with security software for their computers, leaving them more prone to attack from viruses and the like.

For many seniors, however, mastering the technology can be an additional obstacle. Most audio players are designed either to be small, which requires that buttons are tiny and close together, or big with touch screens which is susceptible to accidental touch. Either way it is easy to inadvertently press the wrong button, especially if fingers ...
